A Touch of the Poets

and his brothers

It's not everyday you meet a bunch of brothers who have a certain kind of melody in their hearts, an echo of their words, and a fragile sense of being modern day poets. I only wish that Allen Ginsberg was able to be with us this day of swimming, and eating, and taking backyard pictures. I would have fallen in love again like he did years ago when he met Neil Cassidy and Jack Kerouac. It almost seemed to me that Allen couldn't breathe without having an "amour" in his life. It gave his poems their power and sexual drive but that's such a fragile thing for anyone. If he had been with us this day he would have taken wonderful pictures of dogs swimming, and after finishing off a good meal with a slice of watermelon, secretly knowing that fall was knocking on our back door, he would have jumped in their car, moved with them, and eventually ended up living in a tent on an organic farm in Kauai as these brothers once did—he would have been forever happy.
